The emergencies of the war had given rise to special temporary measures for the employment, shelter, payment, feeding, and general care of employees in munition works and manufactories, but in April apart from the government's eight-hour day and reconstruction methods of housing, neither employers nor the wage-workers seemed to have drawn therefrom any ideas of general application for permanent working class betterment or even for promoting a workable truce between the two sides of the labor question. In the five months since the armistice most of the methods of organization and administration in practice during the war in private and government establishments producing war supplies became no longer operative. While some measures had been heroic, being military...
