I propose, however, in this Lecture to make the description of local facts subordinate to some remarks on the science of Geology in general - on its past history and its future prospects - on the main conclusions which have been firmly established - and on some of those which are now the principal subjects of discussion and of controversy. The history of Geology is a very short one; for of all the sciences it is the youngest. Speculations, indeed, on the structure of the earth, and on the history of its creation, are old enough. Almost all mythologies contain...
