It is the same with inflammation of the rectum, with tenesmus, and even a glairy secretion (anal leucorrhoea) that is sometimes noticed at the same time as an acute metritis, upon which it is dependent. It is then necessary not to miss the original cause through paying too much attention to the result. In one case I have seen sphincteralgia, not accompanied by fissure of the anus, which yielded to the treatment of cervical metritis. More exceptionally, disease of the rectum inversely induces symptoms of pseudo-metritis, but it may be seen. I published a case of rectal polypus which gave rise to symptoms that were for a long time attributed to metritis, and the patient had undergone very energetic treatment for the suspected disease, without finding the least benefit. Rectal examination disclosed to me...
